I think the government should do more in regards to the antitrust case against Microsoft. Microsoft continues to use it's monopolistic market position to gain unfair competitive advantages with it's Windows XP product. The settlement should include more specific measures to restrict this type of behavior. I understand that the government is attempt to expedite the process and bring to a close the case which has dragged on for far too long. But unless the government comes up with a settlement that addresses future products and behaviors more completely, I fear that we will witness the same actions that caused the need for this trial in the first place. We will be in the same place and spend even more of the tax payers money to bring to trial Microsoft again. Isn't the legal process suppose to keep wrongful actions from occurring again, rather than just punish for what has happened in the past? Indeed, we are already witnessing this (Microsoft) corporate repeat offender in action again with Windows XP.

enough is enough!
